Twenty-one Years Ago.

March 24, 1891, North Platte experienced just such a blizzard as we had Tuesday night. The Tribune said business was suspended and the school rooms were almost depopulated.

J. A. Laubenheimer died from tuberculosis after a lingering illness. The deceased had lived in town nearly all his life. For several years he was night clerk at the freight house and later engaged in the dray business.

The total enrollment in the city schools for March, 1891, was 645, compared with 625 in 1900 and 592 in 1889.

William Grady was receiving goods preparatory to opening a cash grocery in the room now occupied by the Stone drug company.

The city election campaign was red-hot. The Tribune containing two columns of communications from citizens, who abused the citizens who were candidates. The women of the town were making a vigorous campaign for Mrs. Birge and Mrs. Longley, who had been nominated for members of the school board.

The Thomas Potato Harvester Co. was organized by the election of Chas. McAllister president, Donald McLaughlin secretary and James McKee treasurer. The object of the company was to manufacture a potato harvester invented by D. S. Thomas.

Down at Wallace the ladies employed their spare time in making quilts. Mrs. J. G. Beeler completed one that contained 2100 pieces.

Louis Burke left North Platte for Portland to engage in the live stock commission line. He certainly made no mistake in moving, for he has since made a barrel of money.

The distribution of state aid seed wheat was placed on the basis of ten bushels to each married farmer. One young man, who had a claim, applied but was turned down because he was not a married man. He must, however, have seed wheat, so three days later returned with a girl and entering the county judge's office was married. Then he re-applied for the wheat, which was given him.

The north division of the Lincoln county teacher's association met; among those on the program were Misses Allie Plumer, Effie Cleland, Mary E. Sullivan, Mina Mills and Bertha Thoelecke.

Geyer and Christiansen "Skip."

Geyer and Christiansen, who had been conducting the Ritner House have skipped, and left as a legacy to a number of our business men and others unpaid bills that will aggregate, it is said, over two thousand dollars.

Geyer left about ten days ago on presumably a business trip to Denver. Not returning on the date he said he would return, nor for several days thereafter, Mrs. Ritner grew suspicious and made arrangements to take over the business. She desired to retain Christiansen as cook, and he had consented to remain, but evidently he changed his mind, for Wednesday night he took his departure and carried with him all the funds that had accumulated for a few days—which probably amounted to several hundred dollars.

The hotel had been doing what the proprietors termed a "satisfactory" business. An average of 250 to 300 meals were served daily and the major part of the thirty-five or forty rooms were occupied.
